The neighborhood, which has a significant amount of vacant land and housing, is re-envisioned as a network defined by social and cultural programs. Unoccupied houses and industrial buildings are converted into religious institutions, community centers, banks, and businesses are redistributed into residential blocks, and new housing typologies are developed with shared space and Internet access in mind. As trees are cleared to maintain sight lines and reduce WiFi interference, the nearby golf course – in need of major repairs as it faces closure – is transformed into an urban forest.
