Between three major anchor sites in the neighborhood's potential mesh network, two blocks are developed as a community land trust where property lines are dissolved in favor of shared WiFi and resources. Vacant buildings are converted into computer-equipped daycares, greenhouses, and hair salons that can be owned and managed by residents living in the area. The wing of an existing church is transformed into a technology hub where both seniors and youth can get online. An adjacent community center will supply Internet access to the blocks, in addition to a nearby closed school sitting on dark fiber that can be reactivated. Cords and cables are consolidated into fiber optic "burms" that cut through the site, creating civic spaces for residents to gather in various ways.
